Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan and gubernatorial candidates from Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut say they don't want their states to follow in Virginia's footsteps, as the Democratic Party tries to keep open its path to the White House. "If this becomes a litmus test for Democrats who want to become president, I believe there's going to be a real turn-off for a lot of voters," Hogan said. Maryland's governor, Hogan, and the five other Democratic governors on the stage Thursday night at the Democratic debate in Los Angeles said they will not support Medicare for All, a policy pushed by progressive lawmakers like Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. Hogan, a Republican, said the proposal would "eliminate private insurance." He also said he supports building upon Obamacare. "Maryland is doing a lot of things right in terms of the Affordable Care Act and the Medicaid programs that help pay for it," Hogan said. "If we can have any benefit at all from the Affordable Care Act, I think we should leave it in place and let people have some more choice and have options," he continued. New Jersey Gov. Phil Murphy and Virginia's Ralph Northam, who are also on the debate stage, talked about protecting Affordable Care Act subsidies and avoiding single-payer plans. The governors also said they oppose proposals that call for taxing the rich to fund health care for all. "Taxing the wealthy is not a cure-all," Northam said. "If you are going to do it, you've got to do it and you've got to do it right." Hogan said: "I don't know what the solution to that is, but I do know that you can't just double up on a problem. You've got to address it from a long-term perspective. We already have a system that is unsustainable." The Democratic candidates
